Personal change 'brings out best'

A YOUNG FARMER from New Bethesda said at a rally in the Technical College Hall on Saturday night, that the application of Moral Rearmament principles on his farm had resulted in better co-operation from his labourers.

He was one of about 150 people who attended the first official Moral Re-armament rally in Port Elizabeth since the showing of "The Forgotten Factor" in 1950.

Representatives from Holland, Switzerland, Denmark, England, South-West Africa and South Africa spoke.

The farmer said that while his father was on an oversea holiday he ran the farm.

After accepting the principles of Moral Re-armament he found a new relationship growing up between his employees and himself, productive of greater efficiency and co-operation.

A director of industry said the principles of Moral Re-armament supplied "the real secret of management."

It was not a case of "who is right, but what is right."

"If one worked on these lines the want of the employee as well as the employer would be satisfied."

A Port Elizabeth couple said the fundamental qualities of Moral Rearmament — absolute honesty, purity, unselfishness, and love—brought a unity, and happiness into home life.

The aims of Moral Rearmament, as outlined by one of the adherents of the movement, was to solve social, economic, and international problems through personal change.

"Moral Rearmament meant a change of human nature which would result in greater unity in the family, nation and in the world," he said.
